Book about memories of activist Marília Pires during the Brazilian dictatorship published by the publishing house Impressões de Minas. Written by Marília Pires. Edited and designed by Rita Davis. Print-run: 300. Belo Horizonte, Brazil, 2018.

Que decepção! Sabes, uma das maiores de minha vida. Eu precisa mesmo mais sonhar porque de nada. Uma homem fabulosa. E como sabe. Engraçado é que eu não acusa nem me sinto contra a Luiz. Bem, sinto é uma grande decepção, um desmoronamento interno. Mas esperar de tudo não me convence nem pelo que não sinto seja. Ladrão. Tem contra todas as evidências. Está é um capítulo a parte, parece até um mau sonho. Está no começo de muitas perguntas complexas de culpa, criado na infância, e que sou castigada. Nunca havia ouvido falar em nada semelhante. Acho que esperar de tudo em vez de tê-lo de lado, mais descansado. Mas com medo de alguma coisa, é claro, mas sem conseguir acreditar na verdade. Uma pelo para a manutenção. É para a pagar. Acho que nunca me sentei tão parecida a ele. Está uma confusão enorme de acontecer-lo e deixa-lo. Mas isto não é possível

Minha filha e eu mordemos, mastigamos e engolimos o cordão umbilical que nos unia. Unia mesmo além da saída das entranhas, pois se fortalecia no cotidiano embolado, no olhar cúmplice com que retroalimentávamos nosso feminino. Até que, sem trato ou gritos, ainda na mesma sintonia fina, começamos diligentemente a antropofagiá-lo.

Canibais de nós mesmas, destruímos um nosso pedaço.

É encantador deixar escapar a primeira pessoa do plural.

Publication

Self-initiated publication about the scientific phenomenon of phantom limb. Printed manually, using a woodcut hand-carved into a plywood wall measuring 3.2 x 2.5 m. Print-run: 75.

Written and designed by Rita Davis. Edited by Lieven Lahaye. Published in partial fulfillment of the degree of Master of Arts in Graphic Design at the Estonian Academy of Arts. Tallinn, Estonia, 2023.

In the article, the meaning of the term "illustration" covers different facets — it can be, for example, the use of freehand drawing, digital editing in photoshop, computer-generated images or the reflection in a mirror. Meaning that the most important aspect of depicting the limb or the pain is to give it a visual form, no matter what tool is used.

Phantom limb or phantom pain illustration, whether created by someone who went through the amputation process themselves or by another person on their behalf, is one way to reveal and allow others to "see" something that is not physically there. The psychologist Peter W. Halligan has discussed that the phenomenon of the phantom limb was seemingly ignored for centuries, arguing that the common sense belief was that phantom experience was caused by a mental disease. Such thinking was a long-standing folk assumption that you have to have a physical body in order to experience the body[5]. Adding to that, even in a severe state of pain, many people who have suffered amputations were afraid to discuss their phantom pain with their doctors for fear of losing their credibility[6].

One technique for visualising the phantom limb is the mirror box, in which the missing body part is seemingly restored through the reflection of the opposite intact limb. The mirror box, also known as mirror therapy (MT), is a treatment invented by Vilayanur S. Ramachandran[7] to treat post-amputation patients who had phantom limb pain. Ramachandran created a visual (and psychological) illusion of two intact limbs by putting a mirror down the centre of a box. The patient then looks into the mirror and visualises both of the limbs (one reflecting another). The goal is for the patient to regain control over their own body. By using this artificial visual feedback it becomes possible for the patient to "move" the phantom limb and to unclench it from potentially painful positions. Other techniques are drawing, which frequently makes use of dotted outlines for the phantom member and also, more recently, a digitally-manipulated 3D representation.

Regardless of the form of depiction, we can claim that imagery functions as an important element to materialise this lack. Illustration is such a compelling tool because it serves to validate one's feelings — a tool for empathy, that communicates to others what their experience feels like, even though they can't see it. The possibility of giving form to invisible things can guide people to recreate their narratives and to connect themselves with their own body and history. This can happen, for instance, in the context of religion. Faith is something that others may not be able to see, yet it's something that can be shared.

Ex-votos

A wooden leg, a crooked wax head, a wax dick, two ears, a left foot, a right foot — all these parts exist together, but they are not parts of the same body. They are hanging from the ceiling of a small chapel in the countryside of Brazil. Although the tradition of offering gifts to spiritual entities goes back to ancient Mesopotamia and Egypt, it was eventually incorporated into Christian religion with the name of Ex-votos. From the Latin Ex-voto suscepto (which translates to "by the promise fulfilled"), the practice is nowadays a popular representation of the catholic faith throughout the world.

Ex-votos are objects such as paintings, sculptures, photographs, or statuettes modelled in clay or in wax that the believers offer to their saints as a way of giving thanks for the miraculous cure of an illness. Famous temples, churches, or chapels, such as Santuário Aparecida do Norte, in Brazil, Basílica de Guadalupe, in Mexico and Sanctuaire de Notre-Dame de Lourdes in France, among others, receive and archive the historical and artistic richness of these offerings. The reasons for making beach, to cut a sofa in half, or cutting bookmarks manually; it can be a karaoke party, a human clock, a yellow table built by hand, long spoons to stir long drinks, to print on a prom dress, to say a word very slowly, to notice the scenarios on your way home, to illustrate medicine boxes, to paint your friends nails or to become a human pyramid — tomorrow it can be something else.

The curious thing about an absent space is that it can be transformed once, twice, and hundreds of times over. They can be expanded or compressed, adapting to different contexts, and by giving them colour or shape, they also serve as a tool for empathy. Not only validating that the lack is an actual felt thing but also communicating to others what that feels like, even though they couldn't see it before. And that is what art also seeks to do, to express and share something that is particular to you. My cultural phantom limb has left space for me to join another community. Space for experiments, exchanges, trials and failures. Space to receive and give support for the unfolding of individual and collective artistic practices. The fingers at the tip of my words have cultivated an absent space that has taken shape and colour, and now it accumulates in my body as memory.

THE MOVING COUCH CINEMA

What inspired you to make it into a film?

There were such strange actions that took place during this robbery. Afterwards, I started to think about why I got so confused. Why did this robbery attempt fitted so bad with my imagination on what a robbery attempt would look like? I had never seen a robbery attempt before, but I thought I would have an idea what one would look like. Of course, I got those images from Hollywood movies. Those movies were a reference for me that I thought I could rely on if I saw a bank robbery in real life. After being a witness to this incident, I realized these Hollywood images were not quite correct in real life. Making "Incident by a Bank" is a way to correct the false images of robberies we see almost daily in action movies made in Hollywood.

How did you coordinate the extras?

I was talking to them one month in advance, sitting down with them, and showing them blueprints of the scene. Everyone in the shot had a very detailed map of where they were going in the scene and how to react to the actions that were happening. On the day of the shooting, I told them that they all have to take responsibility for their own character. If they felt anything or wished to act on impulse, then do it. If I see it and don't like it on screen, I will tell you.

How many takes did you shoot?

The camera is fixed in one position. And in the editing, I did all the movements, all the pans and all the zooms using the Final Cut editing system. When you are making a pan from one side of the image through to the other side of the image, then you can actually change takes. We used four different takes on the film.

Have the two bank robbers seen the film?

No, they haven't. I think they are both in jail somewhere now.

Where did you hear about this story?

It was something that I and my producer, Erik Hemmendorff, witnessed in Stockholm when we were on the way to the Swedish Film Institute. Suddenly, I hear Eric say: "Hey aren't those guys wearing ski masks?" I look across the street and I see two guys on a scooter wearing these ski masks. We became eyewitnesses to an attempted robbery that ended up being a disaster.

Did they run into the wrong building at first?

(Laughs) Yeah, exactly. They were going through the wrong entrance. We didn't realize it was a robbery until they parked their scooter, lifted up the seat, and pulled out their guns. Then they went into the entrance on the left hand side of the building which was the wrong entrance. A few seconds later, they came out of the building looking up and acting very confused. They had realized they had gone to the wrong entrance to the bank. And then they got back on their scooter and drove to the right entrance to the building.

Is there anyway we can hold a special screening in the jail? They can sign autographs for all the inmates after the show?

Yeah, it may be possible if we call the court in Stockholm, but I can't see the autographs happening. I think the two bank robbers would lose quite a bit of status among the other prisoners.

— Did he really exist?

KROKLOK Volume [redacted] edited by [redacted]

Dom Sylvester Houédard (dsh), 1924–1992, was a Benedictine priest, theologian, concrete poet, and spy for the British army. He was said to be a serious but also funny man, something that reflects in his work. He has worked intensively with letters, geometric forms and textures, creating the most diverse universes to explore — across a wide range of materials — sacred and profane dualities and tensions between word and image, plus many other subjects and interests. His work is described as delicate, playful, revolutionary and also with a lot of technical precision regarding its working methodologies, materials, and resources.

Together with Bob Cobbing he edited a magazine called Kroklok: an ongoing anthology of sound poetry (London, 1971) which ended up having five issues — now coming back, around 50 years later, in a sixth issue. This new issue that you hold in your hands is named Code breaker, heart breaker and comes together as a documentation of an event that took place in Tallinn, Estonia in April 2023.

The sixth issue and corresponding event explores the life and work of dsh and is part of a recreation of the Festival de Fort Boyard, programmed by French 'poète sonore' and avant-garde publisher Henri Chopin from 1967 to 1969 in England. dsh was one of the participants of the Festival de Fort Boyard.

Being a man of God and of mystery, not too much can be found out about him. All we know is that he was a code breaker and a heart breaker.

his piece of writing began in front of (and was originally housed within) a computer screen. It flew kinetically through my pawpads into a web-based text editing platform.

Constructed with such diligent digital word-input training that I no longer have to look at the keyboard keys to affirm what I am writing. We take all of this for granted, the ease in creation and sharing of information, ideas, fantasy. It is now second nature and largely occurs without much thought. There is an adapted mechanical and psychological muscle memory within composing a text message or formatting a reply to a work email. Yet, who do I really become when I open my laptop? What does this networked personal computer system in which I symbiotically activate and am activated by, allow or disallow me to feel and share?

Imagine the blend between a body composed of pixels and a body composed of flesh, where do these structures meet? Perhaps the epidermis resting upon a complex polymer or glass-coated aluminium trackpad is the moment this coalescence begins, not unlike any tool of human use involving the exertion of our musculoskeletal system. Screens of various sizes act as scrying orbs into networked worlds of relatively infinite possibility and malleability.

Time spent in this hybrid state builds mirrored kingdoms of experience in our minds. Our participation on the internet, namely in virtual reality (with or without a headset) leaves traces of convincing histories and happenings within us. Not unlike being immersed in a captivating novel, this disembodied embodiment seeps into our dreams and daily ruminations; taking space in our minds as the characters, environments, metaphor, and emotional attachments naturally assimilate as we storytell and play. For those of us regularly participating in virtual communities, especially those that allow a user to pilot a 3D-avatar, these strawman bodies do not just lay as inert player characters, but instead can inform and ultimately shape our offline bodies, self-representation, and even gender identities, for example. Our personal the sewerage extractors, the police—those who deal with physical and social waste. And there they were, amidst a transient show that took place in one of the exemplary non-sites of contemporary capitalism: underground, uninhabitable"[14].

A publication for the exhibition had been in development and was to be launched at the gallery in 2020. The book, "Carpark", was designed in collaboration with the three and myself. The images of the exhibition are sprawled throughout the book with writings by a local writer, Daniel Dawson, interjected in between. The texts are tangential, often in the form of undisrupted rants or organised lists. After the book was printed and bound, we decided to go back to the original Kew Junction Woolworths car park to drive over one of the books to see if it picked anything up from the ground. The idea stemmed from an argument outside of Officeworks, an office supply store and print shop we used when printing the flyers for an upcoming Guzzler show. In the midst of a disagreement about the printing of the flyers, they were thrown out of the window, and driven over.

book holds words. Words hold things. Things hold meanings."[2] What are things, signs, what do they mean — and why are they so strange? If signs are strange, what about their building blocks, their signifiers,

The movement from realism to modernism to postmodernism is a movement from the sign as material to the signifying process itself. The reflexivity of the modernist use of language calls to attention not to the material existence of a world lying beyond and outside language but to the world-making capacity of language, a capacity which points to the arbitrariness of the sign at the same time that it points to the world as a transient creation of language.[1]
